Importance of niche products	LifePhone+, a health and fitness monitoring device manufactured by BPL Medical Technologies, is just about the size and weight of a smartphone. Its uses range from monitoring cardiovascular health to recording blood sugar levels. A companion smartphone app, also built by the company, stores the medical records on the cloud, enabling a panel of doctors to keep round-the-clock watch on patients and arrange for medical aid if required. Three years ago, the medical business did about Rs 70 crore in annual sales. In the current fiscal, it has crossed Rs 300 crore, says Khurana, projecting sales to rise to Rs 1,000 crore by 2021. He aspires to make the business the "largest Indian medical equipment company", which will need an additional Rs 1,500 crore in sales. An important part of the strategy to get there is a new consumer medical division taking shape, which will tap the large existing market for devices and consumables in hospitals. BPL won't go after all of those, but will selectively look to build market share in products that tie in with it the technology it's building. In addition to the sale of hi-tech medical devices like the LifePhone+, there is the cloud-based subscription revenue that it brings in, for which it has partnered with IT services provider Tech Mahindra.
